Fear and anxiety have created a climate of paranoia.

In a series of questions the poll posed to adults, we wondered to what degree they had confidence in their institutions and leadership to provide them security in a time of crisis.

The findings were:

Workplaces

The most salient results were:

- One in five (41%) of those with a workplace have a workplace and school leaders believe safety is a high priority.
- Two in five (40%) feel that workplace and school have a comprehensive plan to deal with an emergency.
- One in five (40%) think that you and your colleagues know who to call and where to report a threat.
- One in five (40%) believe you and your classmates know what to do in an emergency.
- One in five (40%) feel that your school is doing its best to create an atmosphere of physical and emotional safety.
- One in five (40%) think that your school has good communications and accessibility to information.
- One in five (40%) feel that your school leaders believe safety is a high priority.
- One in five (40%) believe that your school/workplace has a defined process to report threats/incidents.
- One in five (40%) feel that your school/workplace is spending enough time and money to keep you safe.
- One in five (40%) feel that your school/workplace is spending more money on mental health supports than on physical safety.
- One in five (40%) believe you and your classmates have received adequate training in case of an emergency.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may positively impact their mental health.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may positively impact their career.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may positively impact their overall outlook.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may positively impact their financial planning.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may negatively impact their overall outlook.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may negatively impact their mental health.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may negatively impact their career.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may negatively impact their financial planning.
- One in five (40%) feel that you and your colleagues know who to call and where to report a threat.
- One in five (40%) believe you and your classmates know what to do in an emergency.
- One in five (40%) feel that your school is doing its best to create an atmosphere of physical and emotional safety.
- One in five (40%) think that your school has good communications and accessibility to information.
- One in five (40%) feel that your school leaders believe safety is a high priority.
- One in five (40%) believe that your school/workplace has a defined process to report threats/incidents.
- One in five (40%) feel that your school/workplace is spending enough time and money to keep you safe.
- One in five (40%) feel that your school/workplace is spending more money on mental health supports than on physical safety.
- One in five (40%) believe you and your classmates have received adequate training in case of an emergency.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may positively impact their mental health.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may positively impact their career.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may positively impact their overall outlook.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may positively impact their financial planning.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may negatively impact their overall outlook.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may negatively impact their mental health.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may negatively impact their career.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may negatively impact their financial planning.
- One in five (40%) believe you and your colleagues know who to call and where to report a threat.
- One in five (40%) believe you and your classmates know what to do in an emergency.
- One in five (40%) feel that your school is doing its best to create an atmosphere of physical and emotional safety.
- One in five (40%) think that your school has good communications and accessibility to information.
- One in five (40%) feel that your school leaders believe safety is a high priority.
- One in five (40%) believe that your school/workplace has a defined process to report threats/incidents.
- One in five (40%) feel that your school/workplace is spending enough time and money to keep you safe.
- One in five (40%) feel that your school/workplace is spending more money on mental health supports than on physical safety.
- One in five (40%) believe you and your classmates have received adequate training in case of an emergency.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may positively impact their mental health.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may positively impact their career.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may positively impact their overall outlook.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may positively impact their financial planning.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may negatively impact their overall outlook.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may negatively impact their mental health.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may negatively impact their career.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may negatively impact their financial planning.
- One in five (40%) believe you and your colleagues know who to call and where to report a threat.
- One in five (40%) believe you and your classmates know what to do in an emergency.
- One in five (40%) feel that your school is doing its best to create an atmosphere of physical and emotional safety.
- One in five (40%) think that your school has good communications and accessibility to information.
- One in five (40%) feel that your school leaders believe safety is a high priority.
- One in five (40%) believe that your school/workplace has a defined process to report threats/incidents.
- One in five (40%) feel that your school/workplace is spending enough time and money to keep you safe.
- One in five (40%) feel that your school/workplace is spending more money on mental health supports than on physical safety.
- One in five (40%) believe you and your classmates have received adequate training in case of an emergency.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may positively impact their mental health.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may positively impact their career.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may positively impact their overall outlook.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may positively impact their financial planning.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may negatively impact their overall outlook.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may negatively impact their mental health.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may negatively impact their career.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may negatively impact their financial planning.
- One in five (40%) believe you and your colleagues know who to call and where to report a threat.
- One in five (40%) believe you and your classmates know what to do in an emergency.
- One in five (40%) feel that your school is doing its best to create an atmosphere of physical and emotional safety.
- One in five (40%) think that your school has good communications and accessibility to information.
- One in five (40%) feel that your school leaders believe safety is a high priority.
- One in five (40%) believe that your school/workplace has a defined process to report threats/incidents.
- One in five (40%) feel that your school/workplace is spending enough time and money to keep you safe.
- One in five (40%) feel that your school/workplace is spending more money on mental health supports than on physical safety.
- One in five (40%) believe you and your classmates have received adequate training in case of an emergency.
- One in five (40%) feel an incident may positively impact their mental health.
- One in five (40%) feel an incid